Further information on Robin Heath:

Robin Heath was an industrial engineer and a senior lecturer prior to changing his career to that of exploring our megalithic culture. For over thirty years, through eleven published works, his research has since refuted the 'Howling Barbarian' view of Neolithic achievements, and aligns with the view of the astronomer Professor Fred Hoyle, that the megalith builders were meticulous observers of the night sky, calculated using numbers, and communicated sophisticated astronomical knowledge from generation to generation.

In addition, Robin has brought to light previously unknown geometrical connections between individual monuments across large landscapes, and recovered the measurement systems and geodetic techniques that suggest how this was achieved.

Through presentations, interactive tours, media appearances and his published works, Robin has revealed the prehistoric 'megalithic science' that has often been assumed absent or otherwise neglected by mainstream archaeology.
